

Amita Shah, Professor, Gujarat Institute of Development Research, Gota, Ahmedabad, India; E-mail: amitagidr@gmail.com; amita@gidr.ac.in Amita Shah (Ph.D.), an economist, has wide ranging experience of conducting research on various aspects of rural economy. Currently, she is a professor at Gujarat Institute of Development Research, an ICSSR-supported organization at Ahmedabad. The major areas of research interest include, with special focus on dry land agriculture and forestry, environmental impact assessment, gender and environment, agriculture-industry interface, small scale and rural industries, employment-livelihood issues, and chronic poverty. More recently she has been involved in a number of studies pertaining to Trade and Agriculture with special focus on environmental and gender issues. She has worked closely with a number of Government and Non-Government Organisations and participated in an informed process of policy formulation. She has also been a consultant to various donor agencies and has undertaken collaborative research both within and outside India. She is also a member of the Research and Advisory Group of the Centre for Trade and Development, New Delhi. She has a Doctorate degree in Economics, and has published extensively in professional journals as well as books. She has been invited as a Visiting Scholar to academic institutions in United Kingdom, China, France, Netherlands, and Canada.